There is so much debate concerning the Middle East and the land of Israel. The debate has raged for centuries, but the greatest myth perpetuated as truth is the idea that the Crusades were done in greed, by the Catholic Church, seeking to colonize the land and convert the Muslims. It is true, the Crusades were sanctioned by Pope Urban II in 1095, but it began in response to the pleas from Eastern Christians who were suffering great persecution at the hands of the Muslims.

The purpose of The Debate on the Crusades is to provide an overview of how the crusades have been interpreted by successive generations of western European (and, latterly, North American) historical commentators since the time of the First Crusade. For nine centuries crusading history has been continuously and anachronistically reinterpreted to expound the (often spiritual) preoccupations of later observers.

My understanding of the First Crusade is that it was largely based on reports of abuse of pilgrims, though whether that abuse was remotely institutionalised or simply the activity of individuals and small groups acting on their own behalf (just as there were thieves and bandits in Western Europe) is certainly open to debate. The First Crusade is also known as the Pauper's Crusade; IOW, because of the widespread economic disruption over several centuries which resulted with the rise of Islam ...

The historiography of the Crusades has been subject to competing and evolving interpretations from the capture of Jerusalem in 1099 until the present day. The religious idealism, use of martial force and pragmatic compromises made by those involved in crusading were controversial, both at the time and subsequently.

Historiography of the Crusades - Wikipedia

It is popular these days to condemn the Crusades as aggression against the Muslims. It is also false: The Crusades were a response to the aggression of the Muslims -- the Moors -- against western Europe. Belloc does a superb job of presenting the details of the campaigns, and why some things worked, and others did not.
