Religion constructs a sacred canopy, or all-embracing world order (Chapter 1). Producing sacred order is 'part of the same activity that produces society,' a result of consciousness that externalizes ideas (Chapter 2). The 'sacred canopy' is an all-embracing order that maintains society against chaos (Chapter 3).

"The Sacred Canopy," while heavily informed by the ideas in "The Social Construction of Reality," was written only by Berger himself. The book is a thoroughly Marxist critique of religion with a dash of Freud thrown in for good measure. The Marxism comes from Berger's understanding of human consciousness.

Review of Thomas Berger's "The Sacred Canopy: Elements of ...

In The Sacred Canopy he draws on elements from Marx, Durkheim, Weber, and others, creating a lively theoretical synthesis. One problem is raised by his method, however: he espouses what he calls "methodological atheism" in his work, which appears to presuppose a view about religion.
